One message said URGENT, in capitals. One apologized for the bother.

The apology was the gas leak.

Residents misjudge urgency in both directions.

The industry already knows. It publishes pages to correct it.

Every “what counts as an emergency” page is an admission that the rating can’t be trusted.

The intake form still asks for it.

A rating is a guess, made by the person least equipped to make it, at the worst moment to ask them.

A description is a report of what is physically happening, in their own words.

One of these is evidence.

Under-response, as the industry documents it:

a $150 repair becomes a $12,000 claim across two units.

Plus a resident who starts browsing listings.

Over-response:

$340 at weekend call-out rates for a $60 part.

Roughly twice a month. It appears on no report anywhere.

Read for what is happening:

gas · water · heat · sewage · electrical · locks · security

Not for ~~how loudly~~ it was reported.

Same two messages, sorted on description.

Squeaky door: routine. Smell in the hallway: emergency.
